

CULTIGEN is an innovation project with a participatory, data-driven, and community-focused approach to sustainable tourism led by the City of Copenhagen and co-financed by the European Urban Initiative.

CHALLENGES

With a significant increase in tourism expected by 2030, CULTIGEN addresses the needs that many European cities, like Copenhagen, share: limited data on visitor behaviour, concentrated tourism in central areas, a lack of local values and perspectives in tourism strategies and non-central neighbourhoods not exploiting their tourism-related potential.

SOLUTIONS

CULTIGEN will pioneer a data-driven and community-focused tourism governance model, informed by local communities and visitors, to better understand their grievances and better inform decision-making. As the backbone of the solution, the project will:

- Develop an Urban Listening Toolkit (ULT) to collect a wide range of data from residents and visitors, integrating qualitative insights and behavioural patterns. This provides a robust foundation for inclusive, data-driven decision-making.
- Develop alternative tourism routes to expand the experience beyond the city centre. Redistributing visitors to less explored neighbourhoods helps showcase their unique characteristics and reduce congestion in central areas.
- Ensure a shared responsibility for tourism development. Through co-creation processes, CULTIGEN promotes the harmonisation of the wishes and needs of residents and visitors.
- Ensure training and empowerment, enabling communities to showcase their cultural identity. By fostering sustainable tourism skills, CULTIGEN supports local stakeholders in creating unique experiences that enhance the city's diversity.
